Table 7: Percentage of incorrectly ordered sentence pairs using different consistency prediction models in CNN/DailyMail, using data from Falke et al. (2019).

A Implementation details

For hyperparameter search, we tried 4 layers with 4 heads, 6 layers with 6 heads and 10 layers with 10 heads.

There're 108.3M parameters in the FASUM model and it takes 2 hours (CNN/DailyMail) / 0.5 hours (XSum) for 4 v100 GPUs to train 1 epoch. The batch size is set to 48 for both datasets.

On validation datasets, FASUM achieves ROUGE-1 41.08%, ROUGE-2 18.35% and ROUGE-L 37.95% on CNN/DailyMail, and it achieves ROUGE-1 30.28%, ROUGE-2 10.09% and ROUGE-L 23.85% on XSum.

B Factual Consistency Evaluator

To automatically evaluate the factual consistency of a summary, we leverage the FactCC model (Kryściński et al., 2019b), which maps the consistency evaluation as a binary classification problem, namely finding a function  $f:(A,C)\longrightarrow [0,1]$ , where A is an article and C is a summary sentence defined as a claim. f(A,C) represents the probability that C is factually correct with respect to the article A. If a summary S is composed of multiple sentences  $C_1,...,C_k$ , we define the factual score of S as:  $f(A,S)=\frac{1}{k}\sum_{i=1}^k f(A,C_i)$ .

To generate training data, we adopt backtranslation as a paraphrasing tool. The ground-truth summary is translated into an intermediate language, including French, German, Chinese, Spanish and Russian, and then translated back to English. Together with the original summaries, these claims are used as positive training examples. We then apply entity swap, negation and pronoun swap to generate negative examples (Kryściński et al., 2019b).

Following Kryściński et al. (2019b), we finetune the BERT<sub>BASE</sub> model using the same hyperparameters to finetune FactCC. We concatenate the article and the generated claim together with special tokens [CLS] and [SEP]. The final embedding of [CLS] is used to compute the probability that the claim is entailed by the article content.

As shown in Table 7, on CNN/Daily Mail, our reproduced model achieves better accuracy than that in Kryściński et al. (2019b) on the human-labelled sentence-pair-ordering data (Falke et al., 2019). Thus, we use this evaluator for all the factual consistency assessment tasks in the following.<sup>3</sup>

C Examples

Table 8, 9 and 10 show examples of CNN/DailyMail articles and summaries generated by our model and several baseline systems. The factual errors in the summary are marked in red, the correct facts in the summaries of FASUM are marked in green and the corresponding facts are marked in bold in the article.

As shown, while baseline systems like BOTTOMUP and UNILM achieve high ROUGE scores, they are susceptible to factual errors. For instance, in Article 5, both BOTTOMUP and SEQ2SEQ wrongly state that Rickie Fowler accused Alexis. In fact, Alexis, Rickie's girlfriend, was accused by an online hater. In Article 1, UNILM mistakenly summarizes that Arsenal lost 4-1 where in fact Arsenal won 4-1 against Liverpool.

In comparison, our proposed fact-aware summarizer FASUM could faithfully summarize the salient information in the article. And it can reorganize the phrasing instead of merely copying content from the article.

Table 11 and Table 12 show examples of CNN/DailyMail articles, summaries generated by BOTTOMUP/UNILM and the corrected version by FC. As shown, our correction model can select the wrong entities and replace them with correct ones. For instance, in Article 1, BOTTOMUP's summary states that Rual Castro, who appears elsewhere in the article, is the President of Venezuela, while FC correctly replaces it with Nocolas Maduro. In Article 4, UNILM wrongly attributes the statement to Scott's lawyer (probabily because "Scott" appears closer to the statement in the article), while it was actually said by Slager's lawyer. This error is corrected by FC.
